BEAT THE CROWD? Shore-to-shore boats on far northern Saganaga

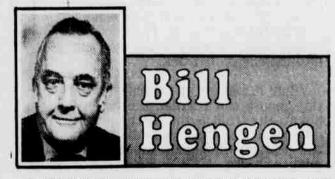

GRAND MARAIS, Minn. - Sixty miles up the Gunflint Trail in the Boundary Waters canoe area of Superior national Park is about as far as opening day walleye fishermen can go and remain in Minnesota.

That should beat the crowd. But it didn't at Lake Saganaga. Boats were almost shore-toshore in narrow, favored fishing spots.

Some walleyes were being caught. But it wasn't easy, and the effort on a cold, snowy morning Saturday in the upper 30s brought blanks for some anglers.

After checking out a dozen places on more than 25 miles of water travel, it was not until almost 7 p.m., when the sun started warming the area, that I managed to land a walleye. And that was within a mile of where we had launched the boat at the End of the Trail Lodge.

PARK RAPIDS, Minn .- For 19 of his 37 years at the University of Minnesota, Marsh Ryman has had a hideway cabin 11 miles from Park Rapids. A silent retreat, with no telephone, away land waters opening Saturday. Those which were caught, and of any size, came from 15 to 20 feet deep in water. They were hiding below white-capped waves on a windy day.

Yesterday the weather was more like it. But fewer boats were taking advantage of the morning sun.

The walleyes were scattered, resulting in the search in deep water. It proved spawning had ended to coincide with an early ice breakup.

On Straight Lake, with Ryman, we first tried the Mill Pond by the dam in the southern corner of the lake. Just last weekend walleyes were seen on the shoreline rocks and in the weeds.

But now they had disappeared. So working against the wind, we crisscrossed the lake for approximately three miles. Three hammerhandles, not varying more than a couple of ounces in weight and not big enough to be called northerns, were the results.

In the afternoon and into the evening, a second stop

The Seagull River, upper parts of which are closed to fishing until May 19 to protect already spawned fish, was carrying more fishing boats than most suburban lakes on a mid-summer Sunday. Fishing went on right up to the floating markers that indicated the restricted area.

Some good catches were made, but few limits were taken. One of the best I saw was a 71/2-pound walleye caught by Harold Chargo of St. Paul. He was fishing in heavy boat traffic near the Seagull River entry to Saganaga.

"I caught a 1012-pounder in almost the same spot last year," said Chargo, who regularly fishes Saganaga on the opener. He was using a minnow and plain hook.

Because of the early ice breakup, fishermen had expected that walleves already had spawned and would be scattered from their usual early-season haunts. They generally were correct. This did not keep heavy concentrations of fishermen from the favored places.

and public campsites and even roadsides were crowded with motor campers. Early-season tent campers also were put on islands on the lake despite the chill.

I tried first in the area of the Seagull River Inlet, then north through the narrows and finally into a smaller inlet farther out in the lake. One strike was the only reward, but the area seemed too crowded.

Water levels are down about two feet from a year ago. Fishermen could have used a traffic patrolman in a rocky channel into the Seagull River and Gull Lake. There was hardly room for two boats to pass in the swift current.

Walleyes were being caught there, and in most places, but mostly two to three pounders. Nephew Bill Hennessy and I tried again in the busy channel where Chargo had caught his fish.

We tried jibs, spinners, artificials of various kinds,

Resorts on Saganaga long since had been booked solid, - live minnows and night crawlers. I finally had a hit in the traffic-choked channel and saw a six to seven-pound beauty come up through the water. Bill readied the net and hoisted in the fish - a 6-pounder all right, but a buffalo fish - a native relative of the carp.

> I didn't want to give up without catching a walleye. We moved into a small bay on the way back, less than a mile from the dock.

> Most of the bay was deserted, with two boats at the far end. We cruised around the shore in about 10 feet of water. Finally, anchored to a rock, we cast out and almost immediately landed two walleyes in the 21/2-pound class.

> The action was on Louie's two-hooked rig and a minnow, with a very slow retrieve. I noted a neighboring fisherman doing well with a plain minnow and single shot sinker. That may have been the best answer on a day of cool fish.

was at Toad Lake and with Tom Blanchard, Blanchard, a mailman covers 30 miles daily delivering mail to 87 boxes. We covered at least four miles and made six stops, each for a hammerhandle under 3 pounds.

But not a walleye, nor a crappie, nor even a sunfish strike. We tried to cover all possibilities in bait with nightcrawlers, minnows, leeches and even plugs.

"Maybe they're waiting for my retirement June 30," quipped Ryman. He would like to retain contact with Minnesota athletics by continuing a part-time association with the Williams Scholarship Fund.

But if our boat was having problems, others were not. Jerry Fuller's window displaying fish entered in his annual contest was enough proof.

Out of the area came muskies, walleves, crappies, brown trout, northerns and even a few rainbow trout

This is an excellent brown trout area. They are there, hiding in holes along the Straight River. Bill Currie IV of Coon Rapids caught a 5-pounder.

And in Straight Lake, Dave Sommers of Minnetonka, used a fly for a 3-pound, 2-ounce brown. While Don Phelps of Omaha, casting a Rapala, hooked a 3-pound, 14-oupnce brown on Fifth Crow Wing.

By noon yesterday the best walleye catch was three, totaling 19 pounds, 7 ounces, out of East Crooked Lake. George Proels of Nevis was using a jig.

The best single was a 9-pound, 1-ounce walleye hooked by Ron Krebs of St. Paul. He used a plain, old minnow.

The 14-pound, 8-ounce muskie came out of Big Mantrap Lake. George Duerr of St. Michael boated it.

Early northern fishermen had something to shoot at. Jack and Ray Herlitz, using their best three on two stringers, weighed almost 30 pounds. Which proved that those who live in Park Rapids know where the big ones are and Daredevels found them.

Dana LeBlanc, also of Park Rapids, had the right minnow for a 2-pound, 4-ounce crappie out of Big Sand Lake. While another native, Bob Helgren, used corn for his 1-pound, 9-ounce rainbow trout caught in Little Long Lake.

The largest single fish was 17 pounds, 8 ounces. Steve Fedor of Hopkins hooked that northern, using a Lindy Rig.

If catching something signifies a successful oriening. then this area had a good day. A little less wind and some sunshine would have made it Fetter.

Walleyes were in their old haunts at Mille Lacs and fishermen who braved high winds and cold were catching them. The same conditions generally seemed to prevail at most other favored lakes on the weekend's opener.

An early ice breakup led to an early spawning season. After the fish lay their eggs and leave for other spots in the lakes to feed, they supposedly are more difficult to find. Such, apparently, was not the case

Don McShane, conservation officer at Isle, said the fish seemed to be in a little deeper water, but "the same fishermen seemed to be catching fish in the same usual shallows." The crowd at Mille Lacs was down some from previous years. One aerial check Saturday, showed about 4,500 boats, McShane said.

Duane Betker, operator of the Roll-In Lodge, said fishing was about the same as in previous years despite the different spring. Jack Naciosek of Jack's Twin Bay Resort, said the best fishing was at night.

After a slow daytime start, Ed Helms of California caught a limit of six that weighed 38 pounds, the biggest 81/2 pounds. Most of the fish caught were loaded with minnows.

Dock fishermen caught about 40 walleyes in front of Izaty's Resort, owner Jerry Dubbs reported. He said fishing picked up Sunday, with anglers getting fish in the same shallow water sports as always. Walleyes ran larger than last year, he said.

Northern pike were hitting on Trelipe Lake near Remer. Staff Writer Bob Schramck had no trouble getting a limit of white jibs and minnows.

Snow and cold winds hampered fishing farther north. Robert Jacobson, conservation officer at Ely, said the crowd of fishermen was far above average despite 22-degree temperatures. The cold had delayed spawning in the area, but most fish seemed to be taken in 20 to 25 feet of water.

The Minnesota river below Ortonville gave up an unusually large number of northern pike, reported officer Warren Breeze, "It was excellent," he said. Walleye fishing on Big Stone Lake on the South Dakota border, already open for two weeks, has been the best in his 13 years at Ortonville, Breeze said.

Roosevelt Lake didn't produce many full stringers of walleyes, but northerns were hitting well, fire warden Roger Ekstrom of Outing reported.

Closer to the Twin Cities, throngs of fishermen tried North and South Center lakes in the Chisago chain. Officer Larry Peterson said a few walleyes, up to 6 pounds, were taken in South Center. More were catch-
